Press dispatches Saturday announced the arrival in Vienna of Colonel Roosevelt and his reception by the new American ambassador to Austria, Hon. Richard C. Kerens of Missouri, an American known all over the world. Together they visited the Emperor of Austria, by whom they were received in private audience, and the cabled news item brings to mind that in our new representative at the Austrian court we have a man who possesses all the characteristics of the born diplomat and is at the same time a self-made man of this glorious country. His great wealth has not changed him one iota for those who know him well. Dick Kerens is always the same jovial, interesting and friendly man as of the older days, a fact worth recording at the present, when he is so much in the public eye. And it is safe to say that when he introduced a former president to an emperor that he exhibited the same tact that won for him so many friends throughout the country when a leader in politics, a builder of railroads or a captain of industry.

But it is not always the case. Mr. Kerens is one of the exceptions to the general rule. Thomas P. Walsh, who died recently in Washington, is another. Unfortunately, there are too few men like them. The picture is too frequent of presented to one's vision of suddenly acquired wealth and prominence completely changing the disposition and characteristics of the possessor. Even here at home can be found examples of the latter, where men and women with suddenly found riches have completely lost their heads, and the suave courtesy that is a part of the make-up of the really great person, is entirely lost in the effort to forget old friends and former ties. They adopt a most offensive and patronizing air which places a ban against further friendly intercourse, and one by one the old friends fall away, leaving only those who have formed a coterie of their own, one with wealth for the keynote, but the arts and graces and real pleasures of life eliminated. The barrier of riches is what some unfortunately are continually building around themselves.

At a recent wedding in one of the large eastern cities a thoughtful bridesmaid sent as her gift a new wedding book called "The House That Jack Built." The cover was of Shikri silk and the upper half of each page carried a wonderfully illuminated panel with the appropriate part of the olden rhyme, paraphrased to meet the more modern conditions. The first pages ran like this:

"This is the House that Jack Built,
This is Sir Jack, of High Renown;
You've heard of him, I'll wager a crown,
That Built the House that Jack Built.
This is the Maid of the Dainty Gown
That captured Jack of High Renown
And lived in the House that Jack Built."

Under the panels, which carried this poem to an imposing finish, was room for photographs, data, etc., which in years to come will be very precious to the bride and bridegroom.
To match this, one of the ushers sent the guest book for the new home, a wonderful craftsman's edition bound in rough gold fabric.
